Market Overview

Ex-Japan Asia's stock markets generally declined in January as a tightening of China's monetary policy threw cold water on investor bullishness following the region's strong full-year 2009 gain. Beijing became the region's second government to tighten policy after Australia. Within the Asia region, China and Hong Kong led the region lower. Indonesia rose and was the only market to gain ground. Malaysia declined the least.

Investment grade credit total returns were strong in January, buoyed mostly by a drop in interest rates. Spread tightening was strongest in the first week of the month but caught headwinds as the month progressed, from concerns over China policy tightening, sovereign debt issues, and government proposed fees and restrictions for large banks. On a positive note, fourth quarter GDP surprised on the upside with inventory replenishment contributing significantly. Fourth quarter earnings releases were generally very positive.

The Fund fell 2.5% (bid-to-bid basis) in Singapore dollar terms for the month compared to its benchmark's decline of 2.1%. Asset allocation was positive in January as being underweight in equity and overweight in US credit aided performance. Security selection had a negative impact on relative performance. All sub-funds underperformed its benchmark.

Investor expectations for economic and earnings growth seem too optimistic at the moment. However as current equity valuations still seem reasonable, markets could deliver decent returns in such an environment. Elsewhere, US credit spreads still offer some value, though returns are likely to be influenced by investor risk appetite. In the absence of a strong view on relative performance between equities and credit, the fund manager remains neutral between the two assets.
